What is a mental health crisis?

A mental health crisis is self-defined. No one is denied access to crisis services.

Certainly when a person is at risk of harming him or herself or others, this is a crisis – and indicates the need for a crisis response.

Beyond this, it is not uncommon for the crisis event to include feelings of intense personal distress, disruptions in daily living, and/or catastrophic life events. Not all crises involve harm to self or others.

What are mobile mental health crisis services?

Mobile mental health services are short-term, on the phone or face-to-face services intended to restore a child's and/or family's functioning level to where it was before the crisis.

Mobile mental health crisis response offers children and families an opportunity to de-escalate a situation or problem in the least restrictive setting, while also developing strategies to address any future safety concerns.

What to do in a crisis

In a mental health/behavioral health crisis, it is not always necessary to go to the Emergency Department.

If the situation is potentially life-threatening, get immediate help by calling 911.

If the situation is NOT life threatening, you can receive crisis services from the FAST at any time, 24 hours a day, and seven days a week, without prior authorization for payment. (If you have insurance, this may be billed. However, there will be no out-of-pocket costs to you.)

What happens when a team is dispatched

To best assist your child and family in this situation, the FAST Team will provide phone support to you, or a team of two will come to you where the crisis is occurring – your house or some other community location.

The team will provide one or more of the following:

- Face-to-face supportive listening
- Crisis assessment
- Development of a crisis treatment plan
- Stabilization services to help the person return to stable living
- Skills training to minimize future crises
- Connection to ongoing support services and/or other community resources
- Coordination with current providers.

After the immediate crisis

After the immediate crisis is resolved, all children will have a person-centered plan developed which will include coordination of services based on need for up to 90 days. This could include collaboration of other agencies such as schools and healthcare providers. The person's larger journey to recovery and resilience will be a large consideration in determining what will help preserve dignity, strengthen families, foster a sense of hope, and promote self-care.

A word about safety

Sometimes mental health crises place the safety of the person, crisis responders, or others in jeopardy. An appropriate response will address the physical safety of those involved as well as their psychological safety. The person/family will be actively involved and the strengths and capabilities of the person/family will be used in resolving the crisis.

It is important to remember that the crisis events are temporary and do not define a person's broader life journey.
